NARRATIVE On Friday, June 23, 2017, at approximately 0816 hours, I was conducting a review of the Law Library computers. I identified two non-native files on the desktops, test.BATCH and cool.TXT. Test.BATCH is an executable script file, and cool.TXT is a directory summary of the Windows System32 file. To my knowledge, these files can be used for malicious and nefarious purposes. From my understanding, the BATCH file is a script file that will run commands with or without a user present. This can be anything from starting a program on power up to deleting/changing necessary files on the system. This program was a basic time response protocol which, when ran, gives the current system time and asks the user if they would like to change it. This action however was blocked by user privileges. This test.BATCH was most likely used to "test" if the user privileges could be subverted. The text file (cool.TXT) contained restricted information. This information was the structure of the System32 file which is the base of the Windows operating system. Any deletion or change to this file structure can be critical to the system integrity. This is also the location where user permissions is held and can be changed. Both files were time and date stamped (06/22/2017 @ 1939 hours and 06/19/2017 @ 0910 hours respectively). Upon review of ViconNet, (Camera - 3rd Law Library) during these times, I observed Inmate Muneeb Akhter (A0165836, 3E06) accessing the computer on which these files were found. Inmate Akhter was previously charge with a similar offense on 07/29/2015 (Incident Number 201501004).
